Applicant argues prior art of record does not teach an integration layer. Examiner respectfully disagrees. Crater, col. 9, lines 20-35, further buttresses Examiner's contention of the presence of an "integration layer". The cited passage teaches methods for applets resolving pointers which direct clients to data residing on a plurality of remote computing entities. Applicant further argues prior art of record does not teach a proxy component. Examiner respectfully disagrees. Crater (col. 10, lines 8-22; col. 6, lines 50-65) clearly and unambiguously discloses proxy components utilizing both java and ActiveX executables. These proxy components facilitate communication between web servers and client browsers, as per the claims.

Furthermore, Examiner notes Applicant has amended the independents to further define the "integration layer". In order to properly assess the integration as now claimed, which encompasses an integration layer which retrieves information from a plurality of distributed installations and provides the information to "one or more applications" for displaying, the claims will require further search and consideration..
